Historical Archaeology in South America series

Edited by Pedro P. Funari (University of Campinas, Brazil)
and Jacob J. Sauer (Vanderbilt University)

The practice of historical archaeology in South America has increased dramatically in the last two decades. To help disseminate the exciting work produced by historical archaeologists across the continent, this book series aims to present the theoretical and methodological advancements being made through holistic approaches to studies of the post-1492 era. Drawing on the documentary record and ethnographic information, and emphasizing archaeological investigations, books published in this series will highlight the interconnected nature of archaeological investigation in South America and its applicability to other parts of the world.

Topics of interest for publication include (but are not limited to):

- Colonialism, culture contact, and indigenous-European interactions 1492 to the present
- The experience of enslaved Africans in Brazil, Peru, Ecuador, Chile, and elsewhere
- Modern nation-states, indigenous communities, and archaeological practice
- New and innovative uses of technology in archaeological research
- Examinations of the relationship between material culture, documentary records, and oral history.
